ON-SITE

Brian's questions 81 through 200 are now in the knowledge base and on the matching pages. The feasibility study page now explains how due diligence is organized, including records, nearby utilities versus available capacity, and the difference between a preliminary review and a completed technical investigation. The subdivision page now covers two access routes, site planning, and what a builder should verify before treating a lot as ready. The project management page now covers permit readiness, constructability, the horizontal construction sequence, and a South Corona first phase of 540 lots completed in about nine months. ON-SITE

The monthly report now uses Land Development Specialists branding: navy and gold, Brian's company name, and a clear split between on-site website changes and off-site SEO. Off-site notes will list results only. The methods stay confidential. Current September report

More of Brian's answers on testing a development concept, comparing the land price with the full cost to build, and running due diligence during a letter of intent or purchase agreement are now on the feasibility study page. Feasibility study

We added a land development feasibility study page. It covers how a buyer should check a site before closing, what the client receives at the end of a review, and how to tell a workable site from one that only looks good on paper. Feasibility study

The page plan is one strong page per topic. We will not build thin pages for every city. Winchester and French Valley stay off the plan unless there is real adopted-rights material. Preferred job size on the service pages, from Brian, is about 50 to 200 lots. Staging homepage
